Seattle

Q1 JANUARY - MARCH 2023

Although the data does show a decline in Seattle's sales prices, it is a fairly marginal decline, and life in the bustling city continues to return to what it once looked like pre-pandemic, with more people returning to their downtown office jobs and businesses bouncing back. The median sales price is down 9% year over year at $864,000, a relatively small dip from Q1-2022. Homes are staying listed for longer with the average days on market at 39. As is expected when buyers begin to slow their home search and take their time looking for the perfect residence, months of inventory crept up from 0.4 months to 1.7 months year over year, but remains a seller's market. Buyers still have to contend with higher mortgage rates than the exceptionally low rates of 2020, but as rates drop and the number of Seattle homes listed for sale increases—up 173.2% year over year—they'll have more freedom to find their ideal property.
